Why isn't all wine vegan?

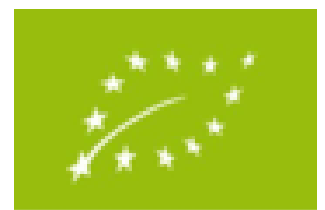

Many people assume that, because wine is made from grapes, it will automatically be a vegan product. However this is not necessarily the case....

All wine starts as a grape which is crushed to get the juice. This is then fermented by yeast, the process of turning sugars into alcohol. The wine that is created is naturally cloudy with micro particles from the fruit and also from the yeast. This can settle naturally but can take a very long time and time is money. Thus to speed things up, fining agents are used. These attract the suspended particles which then fall out of suspension quicker, leaving the wine clearer and brighter. Historically these fining agents have largely been sourced from animals hence wines fined in this way being unacceptable to vegans. These compounds include isinglass - from the float bladders of fish; casein - a protein derived from milk; gelatine and egg white.

For a long time, the only non animal derived fining agent available was bentonite, an unusual type of clay that is particularly effective at removing colloidal particulates from suspension. These days though, there are many more plant based fining agents available to the winemaker. There is still plenty of caution in using new materials, but there are some finding great success with dried powered petit pois, whilst quite a few are trialling potato starch.

For many vegan friendly wines, a synthetic fining agent is used called Polyvinylpolypyrrolone.....or PVPP because it's easier to say. As well as performing the usual fining function of removing any cloudiness in a wine this agent has uses for correcting faults, mostly in white wines and in particular, removing astringency and browning or pinking colouration caused by oxidation. However, if this agent is used at high rates it can result in flavour and colour stripping thus it is best used delicately. PVPP has the additional benefit of being recyclable. However, PVPP is not allowed in the production of organic wines ...

To declare and label your wines as organic in Europe, there are a variety of rules you must adhere to. Organic material must be used at all points in the wine production from the growing of the grapes in the vineyard to the substances used to assist production. There is also a reduced sulphite limit compared to non organic wines. Wines may also label themselves as produced from 'organically grown grapes, but it doesn't necessarily follow through that the wine will have been produced organically.

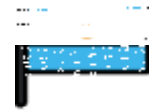

European symbol of organic certification.

The V-Label is an internationally recognised, registered symbol for labelling vegan and vegetarian products and services. For consumers, it is a simple and reliable guide to help them when they are shopping. With the V-Label, companies promote transparency and clarity. Standardised criteria ensure that the V-Label is a unique seal of quality for vegan and vegetarian products all across Europe.
